SERVICE SMILES!!!

The United States should never have drafted Frank Marshall. He certainly was the slowest soldier at Camp Benton. He was always the last soldier in doing anything. If it could be done in five minutes, he took at least half an hour. On that particular day, Sergeant Jim Donnelly realized he had to give a tough talk to this most inefficient soldier.

"I've watched you since the day you first came here," he began. "If all our soldiers were like you, we would be defeated without firing a single shot. You certainly take the first prize for being lazy and slow. Yet, there must be something you can do faster than any other soldier in our army. Tell me what it is?"

With one big yawn, the private snapped back, "I can get tired faster than any other soldier."

Sergeant Jim Donnelly was an efficient soldier. He always had a lot of work to do. Hence, time was an important factor in his military duties. The report came in just before noon:

"Private Henry Wishman was sent with a jeep to the village. A new soldier here. Went off the road. Net hurt. Jeep smashed. Investigate. Make our form 67a in triplicate."

So he got into his jeep and drove to the scene of the accident. The jeep was a total loss. The soldier was uninjured and required no medical treatment.

"Be brief, I'm in a hurry," ordered Sergeant Jim Donnelly. "Tell me just how it happened."

"See that curve," replied the soldier. "I didn't!"

This one happened when the colonies of Spain in Latin America revolted. General Mendez had to send an important message to Colonel Andretta. He picked for this task a young, peasant lad who he knew could be trusted; gave him the message; and told him to be on his way.

Five times, the messenger was stopped by Spanish Loyal Troops. His answers to questions were short and brief. Then he arrived at the mountain hideout of Colonel Andretta. He dismounted from his horse. He began to search all his pockets - except one - for the message. He couldn't find it.

"So look in that pocket on the side," suggested the colonel.

"Can't do it," was the unexpected reply. "Because if it isn't there, then I got troubles."

At the age of 103, General John Craig was the oldest soldier alive in this country. He still had his sense of humor right up to the end. A reporter was interviewing him one morning.

"I'm doing a feature article on you," said the reporter. "Only one thing puzzles me. Fifteen countries have asked that when you die you be buried in their soil in the Army Cemetery. Where do you really wish to be buried?"

"I have already picked out my spot," smiled the old General. "I am going to be buried on top of Mount Kilijaboo."

"Why up so high?" asked the curious reporter.

"I got arthritis, and I don't want to be buried low in damp ground," was the reason given.

He was very much annoyed that his Uncle Sam had decided to draft him. He felt that the government certainly could win the war without his assistance. Now, he stood before the sergeant at the desk.

"I am just going to ask you one simple question, that is all," said the sergeant.

"You can ask me anything in the world. I should have the answer at the tip of my tongue. I held a Bachelor of Arts Degree, Master of Arts Degree, Master of Science Degree, Doctor of Philosophy Degree, and Doctor of Science Degree."

The sergeant was an old timer who knew how to handle any situation.

"Just tell me if you can read and write English," he said.

"The army is no place for me," sighed Walter Marlowe. "All you get is a bunch of orders from the top down. The sergeant gives them to the poor enlisted men. The lieutenant gives orders to the sergeant. The captain gives more orders to the lieutenant. Then comes the major. He gives more orders to the captain. We also have the lieutenant - colonel. He gives orders to the major. There are all the generals with their stars also giving orders. But I guess that is the way the army has to be run."

"What are you complaining about?" smiled Mrs. Marlowe as she looked at her husband. "You aren't in the army. You don't wear a uniform."

"What is it I do?" he asked. "I get forgetful at times."

"You are Secretary of the Army," replied his wife.

"You give them all orders."
